IN THE LAND OF THE PHARAOLIS

Grand Ruins of the Country Described—Scenes From Country Life—Work of Missionaries Demands Admiration.

Luxor, Egypt, Feb. 13, 1907.

We arrived here last night and are delightfully quartered at the Savoy hotel, which is a structure especially designed for tourists like ourselves. In order to give Palestine more time we are taking a few days from the intended river excursion, going one way by rail though the cost is the same, and a trifle more but we are eager to see the Holy land. The ride was uneventful, but pleasant, all the way through the fertile part of the land which is watered by the Nile, for as I have said, the moment a bit of territory is too high to be reached by the overflow of the Nile or to have water pumped on it then the desert begins. The railroad is almost 600 miles long and we have traveled some two-thirds of it and think what a snap for the civil engineers, a line without a single grade, level as a floor, and very few curves. All the way we had a fine opportunity to see the daily life of an Egyptian rural community, and here let me remark that in this benighted land the farmer is looked down on as an inferior person, a "fellah" with hardly the social standing of a household servant in our country. It is not remarkable for he uses the same primitive tools that were used 4,000 years ago; lives in a mud house which is invariably one of a village, not a single lone dwelling to be seen in the whole domain, his rents eating up his profits, and his life one of perpetual toil and privation. It is well nigh impossible to convey to one who has never seen it what the country life is here. Those who have been to Mexico will have some notion of it for conditions are much similar and here as everywhere else the woman is the principal sufferer. She is bought by her husband as a bit of merchandise, is easily put away to please his fancy, is whipped by him at his sweet will and treated as if she had no soul and no rights her liege lord is bound to respect and he may have as many as he likes or can support. Our dragoman is a remarkable exception to the general rule and he has shown us about a number of the villages and given us a rare insight into the domestic life of the people and while he is a devout follower of the prophet he has a great deal of aspiration to be something more than the people all about him and it is easy to see the result. His wife had no dragged out look such as was noticable in the other women and he showed a pride in his children instead of ordering them around as if they were cattle. He told with much pride of the manner in which he disposed of his two sisters as that fell to him after the death of his father. A man wanted the older one and of course had to go to one who had authority over her, the young woman having no voice in the matter at all. Mark, as we call him, told the man she must have two acres of land in her own name and the suitor departed in disgust but the brother was firm and after a while the one who wanted to marry returned and said he would consent as he had more land and was quite well off comparatively. Then Mark told him the house in which they were to live must be in the wife's name also and again the suitor departed declaring he would not accede to any such proposition but his better judgment told him the young woman was a treasure worth having and again he returned ready for business and this time the bargain went through and he said with some pride:

"If he beats my sister now she will have something in her name and can tell him to behave."

What if she doesn't behave? I asked.

"I think she will and am sure for they have lived all right for seven year, but if not, then I will go and take a stick to her but I am sure she will not need it."

In due time the second sister was wanted and by a well to do man and Mark held out for five acres in her name and gained his point but after a year or two he received a dispatch telling him there was trouble between the woman and her husband and though it was in the evening when the message came he hastened off at once and found the old story verified. "No house large enough for two women." His sister was living with a sister-in-law and a mother-in-law and Mark insisted on a separate house on her five acres and it was constructed which caused peace to fold her white wings over the mansion.

Luxor is a place of marked contrasts and is mainly sustained by tourists who flock here at this season of the year. The climate is much warmer than at Cairo though at both places I am surprised to see what warm clothing we need, especially at night. Generally I wear no overcoat in the day time but otherwise find regular winter garments comfortable though here they are a little heavy in the middle of the day. Our hotel is located in a bower of beauty, possible only in a tropical climate. The front portico overlooks the Nile to the ruins and rocks on the opposite side, while all around are avenues flanked by shade trees, flowering shrubbery, stately palms and many other fascinating growths. Just beyond we find the contrasts, for there are the mud houses of the poor and as one passes among them the perpetual cry for "bakshees" comes from old and young. The river presents an active scene as there are steamers for tourists plying to and fro or moored at the wharf, while the native craft are always plentiful and really have an interesting and unique appearance as they wend their way back and forth. To day after lunch we were finely entertained for a while by some genuine East Indian jugglers who performed on the walk in front of the hotel and the tricks they did right in the open air were marvellous.

In and about this city are the greatest ruins of the country but I shall not go into a detailed description of them as that can be found in any good work on Egypt. One has to see them though to form any adequate conception of their magnitude. The vandalism of invading armies is dreadful and enough to make a lover of antiquities feel like tearing his hair. Noble statues of granite and limestone have been shamefully mutilated and defaced, though even yet there is much to see and admire. A grand temple with columns six to twelve feet in diamter has been unearthed under the wretched dwellings of some natives and while a good deal of it has been brought to light, unfortunately the tomb of a sheykh stood right in the way and for fear of arousing religious fanaticism it was thought best not to disturb the last resting place of the dead. Here stands a fine obelisk, the mate to the one which was given to the French by a ruler who had little appreciation of what belonged to his own country and when I saw how complete and clear were the cartouches on the remaining one and remembered how dim and poor are the ones on the shaft in Central Park, New York, I feel that a just retribution is being meted out to the persons who would despoil a land of is antiquities.

Below this city are the ruins of Karnak and opposite are the remains of the former metropolis, Thebes, of which Homer sang a hundred gates and while it might not have had as many as that it was once a powerful and grand city. I would give almost anything in my power if I could take through the ruins of this entire vicinity my young friends in the high school and give them some idea of what this region was once and what a power the kings had and how sadly things have degenerated since. Then I would take them through the missions schools here and show them what the power of Christianity will do for a people so cast down. There are two schools here, one for girls and one for boys and the work they are doing is incalculable. The missionaries go at the work in a sensible manner, not trying all at once to convert the pupils but to teach them how to keep house, sew, cook, observe the laws of health and in general make them useful members of society. The boys are taught useful knowledge which fits them for good positions in the government service and enables them to take a place in world and everywhere you go you can meet the young men who have thus been fitted for better lives. Only yesterday I was talking with a devout Mohammedan but a man of intelligence and with aspirations for his children and he told me that he meant to have them in their early youth rooted in the Musselman faith and then he intended to send them to the mission schools that they might learn something useful and which would fit them, both boys and the girls, for better lives and positions than their parents enjoyed. The Protestant college at Beyrout, Syria, does this on a large scale and while both here and there many become converted to the true faith of the bible many more go forth vastly better prepared for the battle of life. In Cairo I saw several times an intelligent young Greek who had spent some time at the Beyrout college and while he was not a convert to Christianity he spoke with the utmost respect of the institution and what it had done for him in fitting him to take important positions.

The visitor here should by no means fail to visit the mission schools for they are well worth the time and trouble. Miss Buchanana, Miss Atkinson and Miss Gordon are earnest ladies devoted to their work among these forsaken females for it must be remembered there is no mention in the Koran that woman has a soul and no suggestion that she be treated as if she were worth anything more than a useful animal, hence, when we go to any native village we see the girls with ragged clothes and unkempt hair looking as if they did not know anything about clean water and as soon as they are able they are out to menial labor and soon fade and look dragged out. At the mission school for girls I sat in front of several hundred clean well dressed pupils, neat and intelligent in appearance and as I heard them sing in Arabic songs with our well known home tunes I am not ashamed to say the tears would come. I was invited to address them through an interpreter and their faces lighted up at anything worth hearing just as the faces of the pupils in the schools so dear to me in Jacksonville show their interest in what is said to them. I was surprised and delighted to find in Miss Gordon a niece of the late Dr. Joseph Gordon, head of the State School for the Deaf in our city and she is certainly a cultivated, talented young lady and is burying her talents away off here in Egypt teaching girls to read and become useful women. I am certain any person who would take the trouble to investigate honestly would rather envy the young lady than otherwise. Dr. Mursh the missionary in charge, Dr. Pollock, resident physician and their wives are noble people for it is the aim of the mission to heal the body as well as the soul and they devote a good degree of talent to that purpose. These benefficent mission schools are scattered all over Egypt as fast and as far as the means will permit and all honor should be paid the United Presbyterian church of the United States for what it is doing here as the work is principally in the hands of that denomination. I do not wish to be accused of giving too much space to this subject but it is so common on the part of the unthinking or the selfish to decry the cause of foreign missions that I feel like offering a few plain facts and telling of what I have seen personally.

I couldn't help thinking how different Egypt would look to day had the nations of the earth in the past centuries been actuated by the rule of the sermon on the mount. The noble works erected by the kings of the past are simply beyond comparison and it is sad past imagination to see the reckless, wanton destruction that has been done by conquering hosts. Grand temples with fine works of art have been defaced and torn down as much as possible and it has only been their massive proportions or hidden location that have saved them from annihilation. Opposite this place some miles away are the limestone hills abounding in tombs and halls carved out of the solid rock and some of these were so deep down that they escaped the ruthless hand of the invader and are largely intact though some which were partly exposed have been despoiled. Down steep, long stairways, cut in the solid rock the seeker goes and is well rewarded for his pains by feeling that here he may see a number of places which were not invaded by nations from without. True, when the entrances were exposed the natives occupied them as dwellings until the present government took them in hand and now they are all carefully guarded. They were decorated with numerous paintings and the colors used by the artists of the times, nearly 4,000 years ago are still bright and astonish one by their condition. The whole site of ancient Thebes has been filled in with sediment from the overflowing Nile which has also cut a new channel making three islands but I shall not begin a description of it but will get all the pictures I can and if the people at home want more of it when I return I shall try to accomodate them.

Bad Wabash Wreck at Decatur—Illinois Traction Company Withdrew Franchise Petition From Lincoln Council—Functions for Mrs. Bryan.

Wreck at Decatur.

Decatur—The most annoying yard wreck the Wabash has had to contend with in years occurred at 4:30 o'clock Tuesday afternoon as the second section of train No. 62 was entering the city from St. Louis. A broken flange on a coal car caused seven cars to leave the track and pile on top of the other. One car plunged to within a foot of the Mueller factory. Tracks were blocked and the St. Louis afternoon passenger trains had to be detoured via Pana and Litchfield over the Illinois Central. The main line trains were held over six hours. The wreck crew and a big force of men worked for hours removing the wrecked coal cars and shoveling 300 tons of coal from the rails, which were torn up for nearly a block.

Failed to Get Franchise.

Lincoln—The Illinois Traction system failed to get the right of way through this city from the south to the north end along Chicago street and at the meeting of the council Monday evening General Manager Fischer of the system withdrew his petition for the right of way. The council decided to hold over the report of the ordinance committee until the next meeting and in addition a number of the signers of the petition to the council to grant the right of way asked to have their names taken off, thus reducing the names on the same to less than a majority of the frontage. Mr. Fischer intimated that C. & A. interests were at the bottom of the affair.

Farmers Injured in Runawny.

Carlinville — Perley and Harley Nixon, farmers residing near this city, drove to town with a load of baled hay drawn by four horses and were turning the corner at West Main street, near the feed store of William Herzberger & Son, when the front team became frightened, broke loose and ran away. Both boys were thrown from the wagon a distance of about ten feet. Perley fell between the horses and escaped injury, but Harley fell to the pavement and suffered a severely sprained ankle. The runaway team was caught by Arthur Aden near the public square.

Functions for Mrs. Bryan.

Bloomington---Bloomington society is looking forward with eagerness to the visit of Mrs. William Jennings Bryan, who arrives in the city Thursday and will be the guest of Mrs. B. S. Green, her former schoolmate, for several days. A number of luncheons and other events are being arranged for Mrs. Bryan and she will be royally entertained by the elect of Bloomington society.

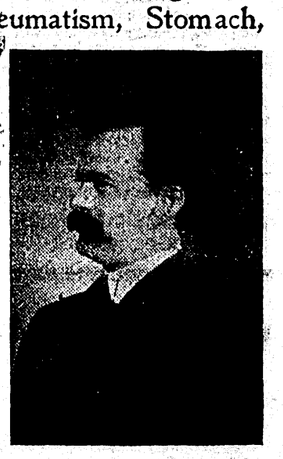
You Can't Afford to Trifle With Your Health

Neglect is health's worst enemy. There are many people in Jacksonville suffering from Catarrh, Asthma, Rheumatism, Stomach, Liver and Kidney disorders, who could be effectually and permanently cured through a scientific course of treatment. I have cured men and women of these and kindred disorders when others have failed. The reason for my remarkable success is this. I have made a life study of nervous and chronic diseases. As a result I do not have to experiment for months endeavoring to diagnose your case, but strike at the seat of the disease at once. I never resort to surgery, but by using the latest apparatus known to science--such as the X-Ray, new light and vibration treatment and many others--together with medicinal remedies I have effected permanent cures pronounced by others as being incurable.



If YOU are suffering from any Chronic Nervous or Skin Disease, you should consult Dr. Coen before it is too late.
